EMBLEM

The blue shield represents the unlimited vastness of space and unlimited potential of communications support provided by the 1920th Communications Group. The mailed fist and four lightning bolts represent the worldwide mission of Air Force Communications Command, providing customers the full range of communications they need to accomplish their missions. The control tower represents the air traffic control services provided to the 12th Flying Training Group. The satellite dish represents the spectrum of communications-electronics service provided to Randolph Air Force Base customers. The computer represents computer service provided to base customers by the group. The "Missing Man" aircraft formation represents the Air Force mission "To fly and fight." The 1920th Communications Group seeks, through the use of positive command and control and professional air traffic control systems, to avert loss of lives and aircraft.
