OPERATIONS

The significant reductions in Air Force officer and enlisted accession rates during 1987 and 1988 impacted on most of the Air Force Military Training Center's training missions. Average trainee population was significantly lower in Basic Military Training School, Officer Training School, and 3250th Technical Training Wing. In consequence, the three organizations suffered manpower losses and had to make adjustments in organizational structure. The technical training wing was least affected because of its major reorganization in 1987. With a new student arrangement—i.e., all trainees assigned to student squadrons (STUSs) in the 3290th Student Group (STUG)—the wing was able to absorb a shrinking trainee population and permanent party without alteration of its unit or organizational structure. The OTS enrollment drop was so precipitous that reconstitution of the informal but traditional student organization became necessary. While switching from a wing/two group to a single group-sized student body, the school also streamlined and consolidated its deputy commander and divisional structure.
